HUGH MILVAIN.
Lexington March 10, 1790.

THE CORRESPONDENT who has been the soul of the effort at heart, has leave to suggest to the public, a good policy of cultivating hemp, as the most certain and the most valuable commodity; This article is motivated at its expense and will be easier than any other which our country produces, and will always command a more certain market, as it is in demand at all times in all the countries with which it is probable we shall ever have any commercial intercourse. The spirit of manufacturing which prevails at present in the Atlantic States, will greatly increase the demand there, because it is the policy of the national Government to filter that spirit as a further encouragement; our correspondent is pleased to inform, that he has the highest authority for saying, that a commercial Government on the Atlantic coast is in fortune to any in America, as it is in content. Don't establish manufactures of edge and fall duces. This district, as soon as a sufficient quantity of men is able to justify the expense, which must necessarily be incurred in making those establishments. He adds that he is convinced this article will next session command a high price, one half penny and three pence per pound.

Toast drinking formerly prevailed in France, but is now totally abolished; however, as this custom seems congenial with the genius of America, it is probable it will remain a national custom.
